

A detailed illustration of a traditional Native American fringed leather garment, possibly a moccasin or a small bag, with various parts labeled A through H. The garment is made of brown leather and features extensive fringing along the edges and a central decorative strip. Red lines connect the labels to specific components: A points to the main body of the garment; B points to the fringes; C points to the central decorative strip; D points to the bottom edge; E points to the side edge; F points to the top edge; G points to the top edge; and H points to the central decorative strip.
